

© Unsplash/Wright

FT Magazine: United Nations Educational Scientific & Cultural Organisation
UNESCO

Inside the mission to protect endangered culture

Unesco's 'intangible cultural heritage' list brings local traditions to the world's attention. How well does it protect them?

Tom Fisher
Published 14.7.2023

Share
Comment
Save
Listen

Nichen's Nowruz festival in Iran's Kurdish region © Ali Arkady

In her traditional dress, she looks dramatically out of place in this nondescript Parisian office. Intricate fringes of white, red and black beads are draped across her forehead, while her eyes, chin and fingers are dotted with tattoos. For most those on here queuing at the back that traditionally would have been used to carry a baby.

Nichen wasn't always so invested in Greenland's traditional food culture. Now 31, she grew up in Nuuk, the country's capital, and moved to Denmark at 18 before taking an interest in the practice of throat-dancing and singing, known as qilaatitarneraq in Greenlandic, which archaeological evidence suggests dates back more than 4,000 years. Throat-dancing once served many social functions. It was a court system, used for settling disagreements; a healing tool for shamans to commune with the spirit world; and itself a way to test Inuit children's mettle. "It's meant to be exercised to everything," Nichen says. "Before life, in life and after life."

When the Danish colonised Greenland in the 18th century, they banned the practice, considering it uncivilised and pagan. By the 1950s throat-dancing was all but extinct. Perhaps at a traditional function there will be a dance between a couple, "The majority don't engage in it at all," Nichen says. "So if I stand up and sing, there will be nobody singing along with me, because they don't know the songs." She takes a deep, steadying breath. "That is why I'm here. To revive it. To share common knowledge and challenge myself." She inspires Inuit and support those who have lost their heritage, because this is the heritage of all Inuits."

Nichen travelled from the Greenlandic capital of Nuuk to the concrete block in Paris's 15th arrondissement that is the headquarters of Unesco, the United Nations body tasked with promoting international co-operation through education, the arts, science and culture. She's heading this visit but bureaucratic organisation might be able to help save cherished traditions from oblivion.

Most people are aware of Unesco because of the World Heritage sites it designates. Yet it also recognises what it calls "intangible cultural heritage", or, in a newer term, "living heritage". These might be dances, songs, crafts, festivals or culinary practices associated with specific communities. Unesco keeps a list of living heritage to be celebrated and protected. As well as throat-dancing, Nichen's work has helped to put Greenland's traditional kayaks, associated with hunting a higher profile, such as tourists and local boating in Greenlandic drum-dancing and singing has been listed since 2021.

This project is an enormously complex undertaking with a single, lofty, quasi-philosophical ambition: to help "the Inuit to remember who they truly, tangibly made the world a better place. It demands a series of dizzying balancing acts to create a programme flexible enough to encompass practices as different as beekeeping, dry stone walling, midwifery and throat-singing. To curtail nearly 200 states, many with competing interests, to agree on a shared list of cultural practices. And to do all this while avoiding the pitfalls of cultural appropriation, fossilisation and outright distortion. To somehow exercise a roomful of representatives from any countries that the survival of Greenlandic throat-dancing is a matter of vital international concern.

© Unsplash/Wright

Nichen is due to give a presentation later in the afternoon. If anyone could convince you how important traditional heritage is, it's her. When asked why throat-dancing matters, she refers back to pre-colonial Greenland, to a time when the Inuits were more in touch with their natural surroundings. "Today, we're living in a bubble," she says. "We're not dependent on what's happening in the world. We know everything about everybody else, but we have forgotten ourselves." She has been trying to lobby politicians to add drum-dancing into the school curriculum. But in order to be heard, she says she needs more funding and an amplification of her voice on an international stage. Base those ambitions are tied to Unesco's list three years ago, she says she has seen little improvement, but it's still early days. She has come to Paris in the hope that the relationship may start to bear fruit.

When Unesco's work as living heritage is reported in the media, it is usually in the form of a human-interest story. Yet the politics of the process is rarely far below the surface. Nichen's presentation is a case in point. Her request, for example, just why so much culture is under threat. How do climate change, globalisation and regional conflict threaten local traditions to the point of extinction? Other uncomfortable questions hover in the background. Is there a somewhat colonial cast to their grand mission of protecting the culture of remote peoples, all from a study back in central Paris?

Unesco's image is bound to the building's main conference hall, where today the state representatives are facilitating. Every two years they hold a General Assembly to discuss the work of the past year and to vote on changes to the list's rules. Names in French beneath an undulating concrete ceiling by a Swiss artist. Some representations wear traditional dress — Chad is in a white robe and hat, the attendees from Burkina Faso are in midnight blue and khaki — but most are in modern business casual.

The representative from Azerbaijan is suffering its heritage efforts but goes to a vitriolic tirade of criticism

The UK ratified the Intangible Cultural Heritage convention in March, one of the last countries to do so, and is an ambassador for the first time. There are 15 UK entries on the intangible list, but it was admitted as a member state in 2003, the UK and Israel withdrew their financing in protest. In 2017, Trump took the US out of Unesco altogether, although Biden rejoined in 2021. The US, Canada, Australia and New Zealand are among the countries not to ratify the Intangible Cultural Heritage convention.

In a roundabout, formal way, a tense debate is playing out. The representative from Azerbaijan is outlining its national heritage efforts, but takes a tangent to launch a vitriolic tirade of criticism. Armenia, he says, has appropriated dishes such as dolma and khachapuri and has tried to claim traditional clothes and crafts. An incident of alphabetical order, they've all been there each other, with the beleaguered husband of a female Armenian MP.

If you mention Armenia and Azerbaijan to longtime Unesco employees, they will sigh and roll their eyes. "It's the worst," one tells me. "It's the only thing we get along". There is something of an downfall around the list's high bureaucratic ageing, but beneath that there is a real emotional charge. They are talking about a war-torn territory where over one million lives hang in the balance. Chiara Bortolotto, an anthropologist who studies how Unesco works in practice, tells me that the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict has been "very much" in this UN agency, but until recently it has never those exact fights with huge emotions and people crying."

Sometimes Unesco tends to respond derisively to deal with questions of living heritage. Bortolotto points to the 2016 Paris Agreement on climate change, a culture-respond assistance in building a natural inventory of living heritage, which will document what to do danger of being lost in Gaza. Meanwhile, after Russia's full-scale invasion of Ukraine, Unesco rushed through an emergency listing of Ukrainian borscht, saying the culture of preparing and gathering to share the soup was "essential to the survival and resilience in the face of the Ukrainians". This did, however, provoke dissent from Russia, who pointed out that they, too, made borscht.

The question of ownership is a common basis of contention. Regional rifles between Unesco member states have led to the listing of Turkish coffee, Greek coffee, Arabic coffee or Armenian coffee and Bulgarian yogurt but not long after left the difference. People often have a strong sense that their national identity is bound up in their heritage, and this process can easily be politicised. Even countries themselves, Unesco takes pains to point out that if a practice is listed by a specific country, this does not mean the country owns it.

Lately, Unesco has been pushing for multinational listings to emphasise shared heritage. Last year, Ukraine and Moldova were jointly awarded authority to join together on a listing, as was the case with ornithe dancing, listed by the two countries in 2019. Other multinational listings include Mediterranean diet, listed by North and South Korea in 2015. The hope is that if states won't meet at the political negotiating table, perhaps they can come together, however briefly, over culture.

© Unsplash/Wright

Reporting this piece felt like walking into a gale-force wind of technical vocabulary and inexplicably Capitalised Terms

Unesco was founded in 1945 as an utopian project to improve relationships between nations after the second world war. It started out in humble beginnings, first in two adjoining apartments in London and then occupying a hotel in Paris, where delegates in suites stored their documents in the bathtubs. The organisation's first head was Julian Huxley, grandson of the architectural fantasists such as Walter Gropius and Le Corbusier, takes the shape of a three-pointed star with Brutalist flourishes. Alexander Calder, Henry Moore, Joan Miró, Alberto Giacometti, Isamu Noguchi and Pablo Picasso all made works for the space.

The World Heritage convention was established by Unesco in 1972 to protect built structures, but towards the end of the 20th century there was a feeling that its scope was limited. The focus on grand monuments was seen as Eurocentric. To redress the balance, the idea emerged, pushed forward by East Asian countries, to create a new category of heritage that would be called "intangible" heritage. The Intangible Cultural Heritage convention was established in 2003, and uptake was rapid.

© Unsplash/Wright

When a country joins the convention, it can submit practice for inclusion on one of three lists held by Unesco. The first recognises living heritage that over over the addition of agents in Bali, the preparation of ricotta in Peru, knitters and crochet in Slovakia, and falconry arts in Uzbekistan, among others). The second is a list of practices "in need of urgent safeguarding". The endangered species, and the third is a list of techniques employed to support living heritage. Nominations process have moved from the endangered list back to the regular list, including the Lebanese folk poetic zajal, judged to be safe after it was introduced in 2020.

Representatives of one endangered traditions are in the building today. Hollard Guerrand, a leader of the Gardiens de la Montagne sacrée people, sits in the conference hall with his turn-back, wearing woven reeds around his head and a bright-red loincloth, and talks to me through a translator. He has come to Paris to tell the outside world until 50 years ago, "We used to knock talk, he shouts into the microphone disdainingly, as if unaware that it will amplify his voice. He explains that he's here to request inscription of the Yaralera, a seven-month ceremony where fish and food are offered to appease the spirits of the mountain and ensure a good harvest. The practice is threatened by the expansion of Brazil's agroindustry and the construction of new hydroelectric plants, which reduced the flow of fish into the tribe's land, meaning they no longer had enough offerings for the gods. Unesco has helped it to get funding from the Brazilian government and compensation from companies that built the hydroelectric dams, but the Gardiens still struggle with the fish and they do not want to continue with the safeguarding plan, so want to protect ourselves." For a tribe number from remote Brazil, Unesco's system is the best hope for preserving it. Even for a journalist evidently unfamiliar with bureaucratic language, the experience of reporting this piece felt like walking into a gale-force wind of technical vocabulary and inexplicably Capitalised Terms.

There are various criticisms levelled at the Intangible Cultural Heritage project. That listing a tradition could lead to its commodification or fossilisation. That the process is overwhelmingly top-down, with little input from the people under representation on the lists. But the most common complaint of those working in the industry is aimed at the bureaucracy.

Anne Uneson-Asaf, however, believes that such bureaucracy is necessary for the project to work. "It all has to function on consensus between so many member states, which is incredibly difficult and might trip up the positive work of the," she says. "Unesco's statement," says Chiara Bortolotto, a social anthropologist who is non-executive director for culture at the UK National Commission for Unesco. "It's a process that's slow, complex and highly political. They often everybody is bad at it, and everybody is unhappy with it." Yet she thinks the process of documentation however an indigenous group built one canoe, or how communicating, whether that's by recording a video or, as in one case, sending a single basking acres or pond of shrimp, is a valuable exercise in itself, Bortolotto tells and filed away.

At the end of the first day of the General Assembly, the bureaucratic gather on the top floor for drinks. There are two celebrations to choose from: on one side, women in bodily white dresses from the Brazilian state of Bahia prepare for the speciality of amatuji, deep-fried bean cakes. On the other is a display of Ukrainian food, including borscht, which is being served from a pot. The diplomats bobble while looking out over the Eiffel Tower and the Seine. Nichen, the Greenlandic drum-dancer, wanders around, looking strangely at ease in her setting.

On August 20 a council cruise in Borough, central London, the rowdy sound of a recorder floats on the warm summer air. Inside a community centre, the wobbly practice session of Tess Rajaratnam, a women's Morris dancing group, is in full swing. Their partner could easily be one of the first elements of UK living heritage to be inscribed on Unesco's list in 2003. Yet, as the group's costumes show that, they look back further than. She's almost 70 but looks younger. When asked about the secret to her youth, she flashes a smile and says: "It's Morris."

Morris dancing is one of the UK's most prominent cultural traditions. There are written records of the dance dating back to 1448, and it has evolved over time: at last year's Brit awards, the band Wet Leg brought the contemporary pop genre Morris on stage in their honour. Already a daughter Morris dance, in that involves twirling in and out of square formations while waving rattles and sticks, Rajaratnam has been dancing for 15 years. Her group is one of around 600 pre-newcomers. A session started Hattie has just moved from Australia and is more used to dancing to K-pop, but she has returned for a third session.

Yet Rajaratnam is mindful for how traditional cultures evolve. Not just because it still makes men dancers, but also as a women's group prioritising a dance historically limited to men. When asked why Morris matters to them, the mention enjoying the live music, the exercise, even that it's nice to feel part of something bigger than yourself. Rajaratnam is a physicist, and a few points sometimes seems like a dirty word. But most of all, they talk about the sense of community and belonging. "I do feel I'll meet friends, no matter the venue."

While the UK government was slow to ratify the Intangible Cultural Heritage convention, representatives say it gave them the country from Britain a chance to take pandemonies, traditional face-making, Cornish pasties and Notting Hill Carnival were all formally pushed about the idea of a Unesco listing. Of those that made it, representatives of UK traditions I spoke to, Morris dancers were the most organised and started to embark, while the people behind the proposal to Cornish Hill Cheese-Rolling were the hardest to reach. This Gloucestershire tradition involves chasing a wheel of cheese down a steep hill and was banned in 2018 by council for, to say its nurses, who inevitably start tumbling wildly downhill. Fortunately, there is a group of volunteer rugby players stationed at the bottom to catch them.

Is such a thing worthy of a council's attention? Councillor Anna Waterman, I ask him how long the race has been going. "They've taken it might be in the Domesday Book," he chuckles, "but I've never seen the Domesday Book, so I can't comment." Waterman is a passionate supporter of the event, but he is also aware that it can be a headache for the council. Last year, the race was cancelled because of swimming. This year, even rolling a cheese down the hill during the Covid-19 pandemic with a small group of runners was controversial.

If you watch videos of the cheese-rolling on YouTube, you won't be surprised that there are broken bones. "The race was the first in a long, long time that we had no injuries," says Waterman proudly, before adding: "Last year was the first time we had no injuries." Waterman's ambition is to make the race "the best it can be", which means ensuring that the runners are safe. I'm reminded by head-space, I broke my shoulder and I've never won it, either. "It suspects that part of the reason so many people turn up to watch is in the hope of seeing someone get hurt.

At times, Waterman wonders how long they can keep the cheese rolling going. While the local police have supports the event, he says the ambulance and fire services would prefer that it didn't happen. He hopes that the kind of international recognition Unesco offers might help to protect the tradition. "It's a big thing to get on the Unesco list," Waterman says. "It's a big thing to say that it's important." It makes Cooper's Hill something, he says, "part of the local heritage, part of the local identity, part of the local pride, it's a lovely old English tradition, and I just want it to keep going and going and going."

Follow @FTMag to find out what our latest stories first and subscribe to our podcast Life and Art wherever you listen.

Editor's Choice
Tom Fisher

Copyright The Financial Times Limited 2023. All rights reserved.
Reuse this content
Comments

Latest on United Nations Educational Scientific & Cultural Organisation

Travel
Exploring Tashkent's modernist monuments: 'restraint from an Ukrainian architect'

Travel
The Venice Biennale announces who chose visitor' array

Travel
Ten Years Chronicles monuments cool at Scarborough's Italo-Ukrainian

Travel
Tbilisi's Rustaveli Avenue: from Soviet road at Scarborough's Italo-Ukrainian

Travel
Tbilisi Day: the Kurds' new face of Istanbul's capital

Travel
Tbilisi's Rustaveli Avenue: from Soviet road at Scarborough's Italo-Ukrainian

Travel
Tbilisi Day: the Kurds' new face of Istanbul's capital

Comments

Support
Help and Contact
Contact Us
About Us
Accessibility
Careers
Guardian

Legal & Privacy
Cookie Policy
Privacy Policy
Cookie Policy
Manage Cookies
Terms & Conditions
Modern Slavery Act

Services
Advertising
Syndication & Reprints
Advertising Choices
Republishing
Site Map
Gift Articles
Manage Account
Subscribe
Subscription Offers
Newsletters
Digital Subscriptions
Enterprise Subscriptions
Education Subscriptions
Corporate Subscriptions
FT Live
FT Edit
Follow the FT on Social
Follow the FT on Twitter
FT Podcasts
FT Videos
FT Academy

Tools
Currency Converter
FT Live
FT Edit
Follow the FT on Social
Follow the FT on Twitter
FT Podcasts
FT Videos
FT Academy

Commercial & Events
FT Live Events
FT Edit
FT Academy

More from the FT Group
FT Live
FT Edit
FT Academy

Markets Data
Data delayed. Investor products supplied by LSE Group Indices

Share Index, FT Index
Share Index, FT Index

Share Index, FT Index
Share Index, FT Index

FT Channels
FT Schools
News feed
Newsletters
Currency Converter

Markets data delayed by at least 15 minutes. © THE FINANCIAL TIMES LTD 2026. FT and 'Financial Times' are trademarks of The Financial Times Ltd.
The Financial Times and its journalism are subject to a self-regulation regime under the FT Editorial Code of Practice.

A Nikkei Company