Hi [first name],

Here are some frequently asked questions that individuals plug into Google regarding divorce and family law:

- What to expect when filing for full custody?
- What are the procedures for a divorce?
- How do the courts determine who gets custody?
- How long does it take for a divorce to be finalized?

Instead of searching and getting an overwhelming amount of conflicting information, the Joleena Louis Law blog answers all of your questions and addresses all of your concerns regarding family law in New York. Each state comes with its own set of laws and procedures, so getting information that is specific to your location is critical and reading general information on the internet can be misleading.

Hi [first name],

Did you know that there are two types of custody in New York? There's legal custody and there's joint custody.

Did you know that in a marriage, the father has the automatic right to seek full custody? If not, an additional step of establishing paternity must occur first.

Did you know that if the child is of a certain age that a New York judge can appoint them their own attorney? The job of this attorney is to make sure the best interests of the child are prioritized and cooperation from both parents is essential.

These are just a few things anyone who is considering filing for custody in New York should know, but there are several other important factors to consider as well. Being armed with as much information and having proper representation increase your odds of obtaining the desired ruling.
