

IDENTICAL TOURIST DESTINATIONS

There are some iconic destinations that seem so distinctive that there's no way you'd find them anywhere else. We are here to prove you wrong with some famous landmarks that have eerily similar counterparts in completely different parts of the world.

Continue on for the photos and be amazed at how even the most famous of places can share similarities with other locations across the globe.

The Devil's Bridge | Gablenz, Germany

This 19th-century arched bridge creates a perfect circle with its reflection. It received its name because locals believed something so perfect could only have been built by Satan himself.

This Dog Behavior Isn't "Normal"

Yulong Bridge | Guilin, China

Satan must have been busy because there's an identical bridge that creates a perfect circle with its reflection in Guilin, China.

Taj Mahal | Agra, India

There are few landmarks as well-known as the Taj Mahal, a mausoleum commissioned in 1632 by the Mughal emperor to house the body of his favorite wife. How could there be anything similar?

H

Critical Race Theory

The meaning and threat of critical race theory. How to oppose and defeat it

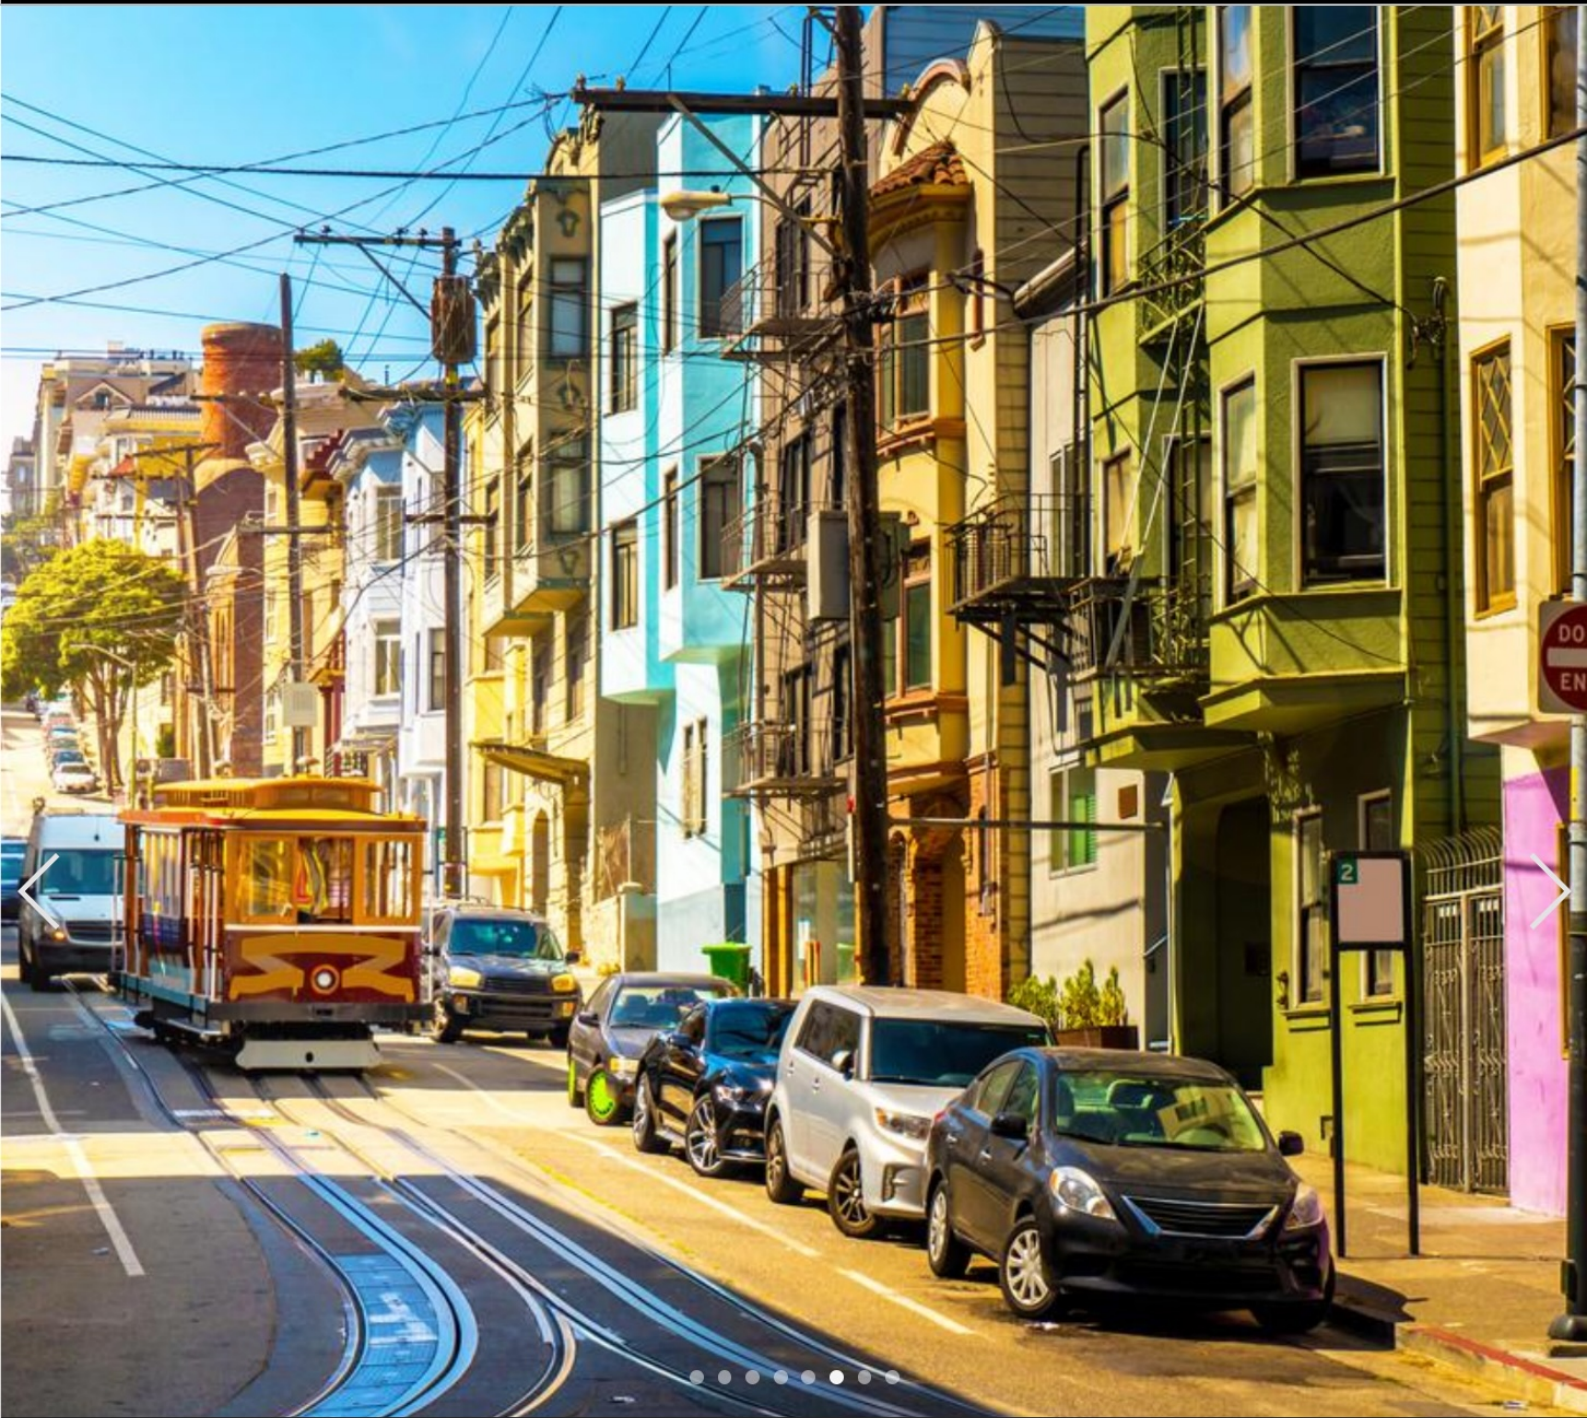

Bibi-Ka-Maqbara | Aurangabad, India

Apparently, nothing is sacred. This Taj Mahal lookalike was commissioned in 1660 by the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb for his first and chief wife. The two buildings look pretty much identical, but this one is slightly less impressive.

San Francisco, California, United States

San Francisco is known for its cable cars and steep streets, so it seems implausible to think there could be a place that looks almost exactly the same.

Lisbon, Portugal

Just like San Francisco, Lisbon also has colorful, steep streets and cable cars — only there they're referred to as trams.

