

RCI Associate Shares Life-Changing Experience Transferring Abroad

Apr 18, 2017

Christopher Curran, manager, business development, RCI, recently shared his experience doing something many of us only dream of doing – challenging ourselves to look beyond our comfort zones, uproot our lives and transfer abroad.

Chris' experience doing just that, and ultimately embarking on a rewarding journey far from home, began with a simple question asked by his leadership: "So, you wanna move to Singapore?"

This seemingly non-serious question quickly became reality for Chris when he was formally offered a position with RCI in Singapore. Suddenly faced with the decision to continue his routine in the United States or embark on a life-long dream to work overseas, Chris was reminded of his father's words: "In the corporate world the possibilities are endless."

Realizing his father was right once again, Chris accepted the position, a decision that would lead to unexpected exploration, newfound perspectives, and personal and professional growth.

Chris embraced his new home and immersed himself in the culture. He experimented with new menu items, traveled to several surrounding countries throughout South East Asia and spent time with welcoming locals who taught him what was truly important in life.

While remaining closely connected to his family through various forms of technology, Chris had the opportunity to work and form meaningful friendships with diverse associates from around the world.

Still living and working in Singapore today, Chris reflects on his experience thus far with gratitude, and offers a bit of advice to his fellow associates: "Push yourself to the boundaries of your comfort zones and see what's there and where it can take you. Be ready and willing to consider the possibilities."

As Chris explains, you never know when your "so, you wanna move to Singapore?" moment will come.
