

7 Beneficial Lessons Kids Learn From Playing Team Sports

Article for a private client, 2024

Playing team sports teaches children seven beneficial life lessons that help them thrive in good times and bad. These lessons make a positive lifelong impact, no matter how athletic a child is. These lessons could even inspire parents to get active again!

Fairfax County School Sports, Jarek Tuszyński

Lesson #1: The Importance of Teamwork

Teamwork proves essential to team sports. The team must look at itself as one that teaches children to consider the needs of others while working as a cog in the wheel to win the game. Teamwork in this way means that, as players, children learn to perform duties that involve giving and taking the lead to achieve the best outcome.

Best Sports That Teach Teamwork

Team sports that teach teamwork include baseball, basketball, football, and soccer.

Lesson #2: How to be Resilient

Resilience means recovering from difficult situations with strategy, grace, and empathy for all affected by the problem. Team sports teach children that a poor decision or a lost game doesn't determine the whole of the season or the entire future, as long as they keep strategy, grace, and empathy in play. Eventually, this lesson helps children deal with disagreements with friends and family. It will help them stick to studying hard subjects, overcoming setbacks at work, and more.

Best Sports That Teach Resilience

Team sports that teach resilience include those that emphasize solo performance turns like batting during baseball and running relays during track.

Lesson #3: Accountability

Accountability means admitting that a mistake happened, whether made via planning or execution. Determining why a play didn't work helps children learn from their mistakes, as long as they can admit them. In the future, learning accountability at this level will help them develop an honest style of communication that makes them trustworthy in all areas of life.

Best Sports That Teach Accountability

Team sports that teach accountability include football because it demands intricate decision-making from player to player and performing the duties of an outfield position in baseball.

South Salem Falcons vs. Bedford, Josh Adkins

Lesson #4: Being Patient

Patience shows a child can stay focused on a common goal without allowing frustration to prevent progress on both a solo and a group level. It shows kindness and the ability to handle hard times instead of distracting people with petty outbursts. This proves crucial in many life situations, whether dealing with the pressures of family, friends, or a career. It teaches children to place true value over instant gratification.

Best Sports That Teach Patience

Team sports that teach patience include baseball because it can be a slow-moving game and soccer.

After all, sometimes soccer games get played without either team scoring despite the best efforts.

Lesson #5: Reading Body Language

Reading body language helps assess situations on or off the field. This skill helps navigate business deals, such as salary negotiations, and when to trust someone. It also helps in understanding the needs of others, which promotes harmony.

Best Sports That Teach How to Read Body Language

Team sports that teach how to read body language include basketball because it is fast and involves a lot of slight leans before passing the ball. Baseball, football, hockey, and soccer players communicate via body language with hand gestures, eyebrow raises, and more.

Lesson #5: Controlling Emotions

Controlling emotions means a child learns to handle challenges with grace. It is hard to lose or to perform poorly, but sports teaches that one's best effort doesn't always lead to a win. The sooner a child learns this, the sooner the child understands how to deal with future losses related to professional and personal relationships.

Best Sports for Teaching Emotional Control

All team sports teach children how to control emotions, especially ones that rely on strictly defined solo performances, such as free throws in basketball, pitching in baseball, punting in football, or goalkeeping in hockey and soccer.

Basketball match being played during ENC Olympiad, Indian Navy

Lesson #6: Failing With Dignity

Failing with dignity is another lesson that all team sports teach. When teams suffer devastating losses, the embarrassment and disappointment should teach them they can overcome these pitfalls with hard work and the other lessons learned from playing team sports. This will help them endure future hardships like a lost promotion or romantic trouble. They should always take the high road and stay focused, which shows they are dependable and ethical. This improves their chances for future success.

Best Sports That Teach How to Fail With Dignity

All team sports teach children how to fail with dignity, especially if the sport puts them in playoffs like baseball or football.

Lesson #7: Dealing With Pressure

Dealing with pressure during a game means knowing how to change strategy at the last minute while still being able to execute the demands of the position. A child who learns to do this will accept change without losing identity or purpose. This lesson proves vital for working in any profession, from being a sales clerk to a politician. It also helps with personal relationships.

USAA Sponsors Military Kids Clinic with San Diego Padres, Petty Officer 1st Class Robert Simpson

Best Sports That Teach How to Deal with Pressure

All team sports cause pressure, but baseball and football are full of pressure-filled moments because of the rules and goals of the game, demanding constant analysis that keeps players mentally and physically on their toes.

Playing team sports forges life lessons that help children set and achieve goals while strengthening work and personal relationships. Therefore, letting children play team sports provides them with character-building traits that will help ensure they handle the difficulties of life well. The impact of these seven lessons begins now and lasts a lifetime.

Wrap-Up: The Impact of Team Sports

Here's a statistic to keep in mind about playing team sports: 95% of Fortune 500 executives took part in high school athletics of some sort, including team sports. Their participation taught them to structure their schedule, develop strategies, and compromise with other players to attain a common goal.

It is easy to see how those skills translate to working a job at any level or interacting with others. If a child doesn't make an official team at school, check out community teams and informally arranged team sports played with friends and neighborhood kids. All children benefit from the chance to play sports with peers and can attain positive goals throughout all their life stages by learning these seven beneficial lessons!