

Life, Guys, and Taylor Swift

I don't believe in life changing moments. Moments aren't life changing. They are just pieces of a story that make up who you are. I believe stories are life changing because moments don't live in a vacuum. Moments are like stars in the night sky. So many moments happen in your life that only when you string them into constellations can they form something. So this blog is for some of my personal constellations, my personal stories.

I'm writing this blog more for me than for others, though. It's more of a shout into the void, a scream into the endless darkness of a night sky; it's done for self-satisfaction. I'm just writing my feels down and letting them out into the world, so they don't build up in me and suffocate me. I'm doing this so I can process my feelings, my relationships with these different guys I've met over my 24 years on this earth. This blog is about analyzing the parts of me these guys created or inspired. It's the parts of me that remind me of them. These guys that have shaped me for so long and in strange ways. (By the way, I use 'relationship' very loosely here. I've never dated these guys; they are mostly just friends.)

Anyway, I'm trying to sort through all the feelings and writing it down is the only way I know how to process them. I must say by doing this, I kind of get why Taylor Swift does what she does. You have to write it down or express it in some form to understand it and you send it out into the world because that is really the only thing left you can do. To me, it's like a fire. You collect the timber or information and form a story that catches fire. Then all the smoke and embers sail off into the universe to exist, and from the ashes you start anew.

So that's it. This is my fire to get rid of the old to make room for the hopeful new!