MALE BIRTH CONTROL RESEARCH THREATENS MARCH MADNESS

March Madness, a neurodegenerative disease in adult cows and a degenerate disorder in adult men, is back.

The NCAA Tournament usually correlates with an uptick in vasectomies so men can have an excuse to watch college basketball, but this year's huge rivalry may instead be a pick between leisure and a non-surgical male contraceptive.

Miami University has bragging rights to an experimental birth control pill that researchers claim "will stop [morons like] you from reproducing."

Currently, men only have three effective options for birth control: condoms, vasectomies, and bad hygiene.

This miraculous contraceptive works to reduce excess dribbling, completely changing the game.

Men can expect that travel restrictions will begin to lift on and off the court, and that frustrated fans will have to lift themselves off the couch.

"I just wanted to watch men play with balls and passionately sweat on each other," some guy from high school posted online. "My bracket and the economy are ruined."

If men don't catch the game, the first website to pop up says that side effects include headaches, nausea, spontaneous combustion, erectile malfunction, and mood swings (tantrums).

MIAMI UNIVERSITY TO OFFER BACHELOR'S DEGREE IN UNDECIDED

Undergraduates who underprepare have been given a second chance at life thanks to a new degree in nothing in particular.

"At Miami, you can do and be anything you choose," the major description reads. "After, you're on your own lmao [sic]."

The post-pandemic job market seems to also hold this over graduates, too.

"Employers don't value your diploma or qualifications," a career specialist told us. "They want to see [graduates] buckle under the weight of late-stage capitalism."

PICK A WEEKLY 3 TOPIC, GET THE WHOLE STORY

The Weekly 3 leaves out the good parts.

Hate & Dishonor presents this week's dishonorable mentions:

1. The Rec Center has hired paid actors to offer unsolicited exercise advice to patrons as a solution to overpopulation.
2. The Howe Writing Center has replaced its consultants with chatbots capable of proofreading drunk texts.
3. Student Counseling Services now offers walk-in lobotomies during regular operating hours.

MASCOT KILLS VISITING BASEBALL TEAM, VOWS TO STRIKE AGAIN

HAYDEN PARK — Police have just made an arrest in connection to the quadragintuple homicide of an unidentified visiting baseball team.

Swoop the Redhawk, 25, was arrested on 40 counts of first-degree murder and a degree in sport leadership and management after attempting to run home, but he may not pass time behind bars.

The umpire could make a controversial judgement call on the grounds of team spirit that would allow the mascot to walk free, which means he would be awarded first base without the possibility of being called out of parole.

Families of the losing victims will likely appeal that decision, and their attorneys are ready to heckle for a harsher penalty.

“[Swoop] is dangerous,” attorneys stated. “If he sees red again, there’s no telling what he might do.”

Attorneys may have a home-field advantage against the recently divorced mascot thanks to new evidence.

Police have released footage that shows Swoop warming up in the bullpen with a semi-automatic pitching machine and scrawling in an annotated paperback of The Catcher Behind Home Plate.

All eight spectators of the crime told police that the anthropomorphic raptor battered the away team with a baseball bat; autopsies confirmed this, which brings his batting average up to a .408 this season.

Swoop only had this to tell our reporters: “I am guilty, but I will never plead.”

The scoreboard will observe a moment of silence followed by 40 uninterrupted hours of “Take Me Out (to the Ball Game)”.

THE WEATHER

Hangovercast is persisting in the region. Beware of false spring, which comes to you in a fake tan, but outwardly it is freezing winds. April Fools comes early as the temperature pranks our earthly existence.
