

The Crisis in Yemen

Every ten minutes, a child dies of starvation in Yemen.

Right now, the country is currently plunging towards the worst famine the world has seen in decades.

Already one of the poorest countries in the region, the country's devastated economy has left millions unable to afford food and essentials items. The latest data reveal that more than 2 million children and over 1 million pregnant women and new mothers are currently severely malnourished.

Families have become very desperate as the impact of the economy takes its toll.

Yemen's communities also face health risks amplified by a lack of money to purchase medicine or travel to clinics. In addition to this, there's also the deadly danger of low-quality water and sanitation.

Two-thirds of Yemen's population have almost nothing to eat, and over 24 million people need our help, the highest figure across the globe.

Trying to stave off famine in these circumstances is a big challenge.

With COVID-19, things have only become harder. Worrying about the virus has come second – as families must focus all their energies on finding the next meal.

While the country endures unthinkable aid cuts in 2021, it makes the window of assistance even narrower. As the situation continues to devastate families and put civilians at grave risk, the people of Yemen require humanitarian aid now more than ever.

Yemeni's have found themselves asking: "Why has the world abandoned us?" as more people starve daily.

Right now, things are becoming heartbreakingly dire, a stark reminder of the fragility of human life amidst conflict and economic collapse and it is a crisis that demands not just our attention, but our collective action.

Every contribution, no matter how small, can pave the way for hope and survival for those who continue to suffer every day.

Don't let Yemen's plea for help go unanswered.
