

Hair metal rockers, Midnite City, have just announced the upcoming release of their fourth studio album. The band has been quite tight-lipped about what can be expected from their album but has mentioned that the album is going to be released in Summer. This announcement came from the band themselves via their Facebook page where they are seen getting cosy in Ratcat Studios. They have posted on their page, assuring fans that, 'Album 4 is starting to shape up nicely'. With the news of the new album being released there are mentions of a tour that has been booked and that the band are to take to the road again in June.

Forming in 2017, Midnite City have branded themselves on their high energy and retro sound, building up an incredibly loyal fanbase over their years of performing together as a band. The band have been consistently active all throughout their career, their latest album 'Itch You Can't Scratch' being released all but two years ago. To fill up their time between album releases, they have been touring extensively across the UK, playing small yet popular venues in the local scene. Last year, there was the announcement that the band's original drummer, Pete Newdeck, had departed from the band. The band have hinted at finding a new permanent drummer, after having Ryan Briggs, drummer of UK based band Atlas, but have not officially announced who is going to be taking that place.
