

Travel is Being Affected by The Invasion of Ukraine?

By Nabila Shakina

The fact that we need to consult the maps to assess the possible threats – shows how wide are the effects of Putin’s assault. The “wait and see” everyone used to have in mind just like the happening pandemic, looks like not helpful advice for millions of prospective travelers. At a time when people in Ukraine are being attacked so brutally by a vast nation intent on destroying democracy, talk about holidays may strike you as inappropriate as well.

How the European Union closed all the airspace across its 27 countries to Russian airplanes following a steady stream of announcements of airplane closures from member countries and others, the number of canceled flights and the moving air traffic outside of the affected areas are a fast-moving situation. Not only that, there are many Russian people stuck in Bali, Indonesia because they were about to go on vacation and not knowing that their Country is gonna be at war and now they’re having their Visa and Master Card banned here. Though, the impact is muted as a result in terms of the coronavirus, looking ahead to the summer putting the main impact is likely to be on travelers’ confidence. We will have to see the extent how which these latest events impact the consumers’ confidence in tourism, as well as coronavirus restrictions, which have been taking down the international travel demand.

I believe, though, that it is a reasonable thing to analyze the consequences for international travel of Vladimir Putin’s unprovoked attack on neighbor — while recognizing the immense of the people of Ukraine is rightly the world's main concern, in these dark days, "wait and see" might be the best consideration as for a conclusion.
