

Stars outside the 1st Round

We've had a look at the potential fallers. Now let's look at the gems lurking lower down the boards. These are the guys that give you goosebumps on Madden as that round 1 talent green diamond pops up for a dude projected to go in the 5th.

Kyle Dugger (Safety, Lenoir-Rhyne) - Dugger has garnered more and more attention during the scouting process. He was hardly the talk of college football before the draft because no one outside of Hickory knows where the hell Lenoir-Rhyne University is. You're getting an Isiah Simmons lite here, both in size and impact on the game.

Anthony Gordon (Quarterback, Washington State) - Has thrown for a ton of yards at the place where the Minsh went. Processes the game well, and looks poised in the pocket. Small, slight, rattled, but we like the mindset

JJ Taylor (Running back, Arizona) - CHOO CHOO...at 5'5 185lbs

Laviska Shenault (Wideout, Colorado) - Bit of a forgotten guy who looked to be going in the first round, but his injury and subsequent inability to participate in the combine have hit his draft stock. Makes no difference to us, he's a playmaker with the ball and can have a Deebo Samuel, gadget style impact on any offence.

Jordan Elliott (Defensive tackle, Missouri) - If the Mizzou product can produce those dominant flashes on a biannual basis, you've got yourself a game wrecker capable of demolishing the interior of any offensive line.

Anthony McFarland Running back, Maryland) - This kid is lightning in a bottle. Ankle breaking moves and electric feet, curtailed mainly by Maryland's refusal to give him the ball. He definitely can't carry the load for you but will give you a jaw dropping play every other game.