3 Interesting Career Paths Architecture Majors Can Choose From

Graduating as an Architecture major may have developed your skills in different areas, such as creativity and design. Moreover, although most graduates will look forward to becoming chartered architects, there are still other career paths that you can choose.

Landscape Architect

The first career path is that of a landscape architect. It focuses on planning, designing, and managing open spaces, including natural and urban areas. A landscape architect will plan and design public outdoor spaces like parks. They will be employed in private, public, and academic organizations. If you are interested in landscape architecture and the outdoors, then a landscape architect's career path might be best suited.

Restoration Architect

A restoration architect specializes in preserving and conserving historic buildings and monuments. Restoration architects must alter or restore these buildings and monuments to prevent deterioration. They are an integral part of a restoration project from conception to completion, and they may work on projects of various sizes and scales. If you are interested in restoration and want to participate in projects like these, then a restoration architect's career path might be best suited.

Urban Planner

The last career path is an urban planner, similar to a landscape architect but has more complex duties. An urban planner develops plans and programs for the use of land. They plan to create communities, accommodate growth, or revitalize physical facilities in towns, cities, counties, and metropolitan areas. If you are interested in a project almost like building a city, then an urban planner's career path might be best suited for you.

If you are still an incoming college student and have not chosen which school to study Architecture from, you might want to look at [College Name]. It is a college in the Philippines and one of Manila's top colleges, best known for its culinary arts and business programs. It recently opened an Architecture program spearheaded by industry experts, so rest assured that you are in good hands.
