

AIMING HIGHER FOR SUCCESS

- Reporter: Mitta Xinindlu

Women around the world have proven many times that it is important to never assume, in life, that we have arrived at your destination. The destination is, of course, our goals. This philosophy means that we should never arrive at a 'comfortable' position in life; because once we achieve this hypothetical 'comfort', we will never want to do anything else. So, the best way to achieve is to never define our achievements as the destination.

When we follow this mindset, we turn our life into a rolling wheel which knows no end and no limitations. We learn to keep on moving and reaching greater heights. The more we keep pushing forward, the more we define new levels of achievements, new points of celebrations, and new points of making life our slave.

Many wonder why it is so important to never arrive. They say it is good to stop and smell the roses or to enjoy the fruits of our work. Fair enough. It's a reasonable argument. However, this statement assumes that we are meant to only enjoy the benefits of our work after we've defined the work as finished. This mentality is the same one that drives many people to work without enjoying their lives.

The mentality of never arriving allows us to enjoy the fruits of our work at the same time as we are completing it. Hence many organisations started the work-balance lifestyle. In France, for example, people take longer lunch hours and refuse to work extra time without compensations. They realise that it is good to work, but also it is best to enjoy the fruits of our work. With this mentality, they manage to keep going and getting more achievements without ever arriving at the destination. Achievements become a part of their lives, and careers become a vehicle for achieving their goals.
