

<h1>Changing Jobs or Careers in 2023</h1>

Changing jobs or careers is a daunting task. Whether you are seeking a new job or changing careers, the prospect is intimidating. Yet, this year promises to be an opportune time to take that big step.

If you are in a job that seems pointless or your career is not developing in a positive direction, this year is the time to make a change. Below are insights on how to change jobs or careers in 2023.

<h2>A Good Year to Change Jobs or Careers</h2>

From 2021 to 2022, people left their jobs at an unprecedented rate. The Great Resignation resulted in employees having more leverage and remote and hybrid work becoming permanent aspects of the job landscape.

Those looking for a new job or career change can now seek out remote and hybrid positions. Most industries today view such arrangements as a necessity and not a luxury. Since the pandemic, employers and employees think favorably about hybrid and remote situations, which broadens work opportunities.

Careers today are less linear and changing a career is a normal part of the working life. Workers move across industries and companies and change their roles frequently today. Employers do not expect only one or two companies to be listed on a resume or only specialized skills.

Recent research indicates that the average U.S. worker changes jobs 12 times in a lifetime and only spends about 4 years with one employer. If your resume has different contours to it, that is not a negative aspect.

Also, around 65% of Americans are looking for full-time work right now. That means you are not alone in seeking a new job or career. As you prepare to launch a new career or find a new job, review your work background, and ask yourself some key questions.

<h2>How to Make a Career Change?</h2>

Start by assessing your strengths and weaknesses. Ask yourself what areas you have excelled at and what positive feedback has been offered about your skill set. Use that information to rework your resume and identify areas to improve upon.

Then evaluate whether you still want to stay in the same industry and what different types of positions are available. For example, the financial industry consists of bankers, insurance underwriters, investment managers, and many other positions. If you have worked in one area, many skills are transferable to another position.

If you are seeking a new industry, determine which skills can also transfer over to different positions. Transitioning from investment into healthcare, for example, often requires similar organizational, management, computer, and personal skills.

Find ways to develop new skills. For example, you may find that a coding or technical writing class would help sharpen your existing skill base. Taking existing skills and combining them with new ones is an excellent way to make yourself more marketable.

<h2>How to Find a New Job or Career?</h2>

In today's electronic age, the first way to find a new job or career is through Internet job sites. Employers and job seekers both look to LinkedIn as the first job search platform. LinkedIn also provides networking opportunities that allow candidates to connect with companies and other job seekers.

Indeed is also a top job search platform that can be used to find positions and learn more about companies. With an account, you can also tailor searches and get emails about job matches. Glassdoor is another online job search option that provides both wide and tailored job searches.

Research positions that are growing and in demand. These jobs will also pay higher. Human Resources Managers and Market Research Managers fit this criterion. These are in-demand positions that pay well. The first would be suitable for someone with communication and interpersonal experience, while the second requires research and analysis skills.

Being willing to accept part-time, entry-level, or contract work will help you get into a field if you need to develop your background more. Writing out a plan and keeping track of the positions you have applied will also be helpful.
