

When Peter Pan grew up

Peter noticed how agitated Tinkerbell was. He followed the little fairy to a window and they both took a peek inside the room. It was a nursery, there were two boys and a girl. Wendy was putting her two younger brothers, John and Michael, to sleep when suddenly Michael noticed a glare coming from outside. He could see it through the window, it was Tinkerbell's bright wings. When Wendy came closer to the window, Peter felt completely drawn to her eyes, but she was in awe. Only then, Peter realized that kids weren't used to seeing flying boys outside their bedroom windows. Michael and John immediately opened the window and let them in.

As the night went on, the kids couldn't stop asking questions to Peter, and begging him to teach them how to fly, until he decided they were brave and smart enough to learn. But first, he told them about where he lived: a place called Neverland, where children didn't have to grow up. The boys insisted on visiting the place. Wendy was a little reluctant, but soon she was surrendered by curiosity. And so, Peter told them to think happy thoughts. A moment later, they were floating and laughing and off to Neverland.

The place was exactly how Peter had described it. The trees were tall, but the leaves didn't cover the light from the sun. They could admire the forest and all its beauty. Wendy tried to remember the last flower she had seen that smelled that sweet, but she couldn't. It seemed like every single aspect of Neverland was perfect. The air was purer, the flowers had an impeccable perfume, even food tasted better.

They met Peter's troop of lost boys, who liked Wendy so much, they elected her as their new mother. The kids had a lot of adventures together and soon, little by little, they began to forget about their parents, their house, their room and their comfortable beds.

One day, the children met Peter's nemesis: Captain Hook. He was an evil pirate who hated Peter for always ruining his plans, but this time he had the perfect one to finally defeat Pan. Hook kidnapped Wendy and her brothers. Peter felt an uncontrollable rage. They both engaged in a heated sword fight to the point of exhaustion, but luckily Peter managed to throw Hook out of the ship and into the water. Only then, he became aware of the fact that the big bad captain didn't know how to swim. He felt compelled to help him, and so Peter saved Hook from getting drowned. From that day on, Captain Hook promised the boys he would never misbehave again.

While the lost boys were chanting in victory, Wendy and her brothers remembered how safe they were living with their parents, and now, they were missing them terribly. She asked the lost boys to come back with her and so they did, along with Peter. The kid's parents were so relieved they had returned that they were willing to adopt all the boys, including Peter, who was disappointed because now he had to grow up at last.
