

As a writer I am open to a lot of new themes and ideas, the first time I can remember enjoying writing is in 4th grade when we had to write a fictional story. I loved that assignment and actually still have the story I wrote. After that I got really into reading and writing and always loved English class and found it very interesting. The first book I remember reading and really loving was "Thousand Words". After this I found this book I was in love with reading and went to half price books everyday. A Lot of these books definitely shaped my view on social media and highschool life since I read all these in middle school so it was like my own little coming of age story, with that being said I feel like that is what qualifies me as a writer, to me a writer is anybody who has a story to tell, so in a way anybody and everybody can be a writing I just think the better writers have a way with words. I've always loved to write because I talk a lot so it's also always been an outlet, maybe not story but my notes are full of my life and feelings and stories I feel i couldn't express to anybody else, I enjoy writing because you don't have to hold your tongue, or be sensitive, and not worry about stepping on toes especially if the writing you're doing is only for you, you can be your true authentic self. This is the reason I think I'm geared more toward realistic fiction and highschool stories as well as just womanly stories because I relate to them the most, but I also have an exception for non fiction books about serial killers because that's also something I'm very interested because writers can put feelings into the best describing words, so smoothly and fit it together perfectly. Me particularly as a writer I really enjoy research papers and storytelling, I feel like those are my strongest subjects in writing.
