The Duke and Duchess of Sussex sat down in a video conference call with young leaders of the Queen's Commonwealth Trust to talk about the changes that need to be made for a better world. Since Prince Harry and Meghan have stepped down as Royals, they have lived quietly and away from the spotlight. But now with the Black Lives Matter movement's increasing momentum, deeper conversations about race relations and systematic oppression have been perpetuated.

The couple, who also serves as President and Vice President of the Commonwealth Trust, discussed such issues with Chrisann Jarrett, QCT Trustee and co-founder and co-CEO of We Belong; Alicia Wallace, director of Equality Bahamas; Mike Omoniyi, founder and CEO of The Common Sense Network; and Abdullahi Alim, leader of the World Economic Forum's Global Shapers network in Africa and the Middle East.

Prince Harry opened up the virtual conversation by recognizing the group's privileges. "We can't deny or ignore the fact that all of us have been educated to see the world differently," he said. "However, once you start to realize that there is that bias there, then you need to acknowledge it, you need to do the work to become more aware... so that you can help stand up for something that is so wrong and should not be acceptable in our society today."

Omoniyi mentioned how white allies can do more with their platforms instead of posting hashtags and information online. It's all about what people do offline that matters most. "All of that's great, but after pressing 'send' online, I think people are going to roll up their sleeves and do the work. And the work is a lot more than just a one-time thing. Any white person who thinks 'how can I help?' has to start from that place of humility asking 'I'm willing to be comfortable with being uncomfortable.'"

Viewers online appreciated all parties taking part in the conversation in regards to the Black Lives Matter movement.
