

Quote:

- "We need to understand that a particular discourse comes into existence because of some specific condition or situation which invites utterance."
- I chose this quotation because it explains that "situations" always have meaning behind them, in which something has to happen in order for them to exist to begin with. The quote is significant because its purpose is what the writer and text aim to do. Therefore, when a writer uses a rhetorical situation in their writing, the meaning behind it is what they're aiming their work towards. Rhetorical situations make the reader think outside the box.

Question:

- The question I have about this quote is, how major does the condition or situation have to be in order to invite utterance?
- Utterance is spoken words or "chatter". People like to chatter and gossip about situations, however, only ones that have relevance to their lives. So my question is, how does a writer make a rhetorical situation relevant enough for it to invite utterance among others?
