Enjoy the wonderful Alaskan wilderness on our guided salmon fishing trips. Alaska is bursting with wild salmon, as well as many other species of fish. With our experienced, licensed guides, you not only catch fish, but you also get the opportunity to soak up the stunning Alaskan scenery. During the Alaska fishing season, the cold waters off the southeastern coast support five species of Pacific salmon – Chinook, Sockeye, Chum, Pink and Coho -- and depending on when you plan your trip, you may be able hook them all.

Alaska is a year-round destination for anglers, but to ensure your salmon fishing vacation is a success, you'll need to time it right. Salmon runs begin in May and extend through the end of September, and different species appear at different points throughout the season. Fortunately, the experienced team at Pybus Point Lodge knows when the Alaskan waterways are swimming with each Pacific species.

Chinook Salmon

Alaska's official state fish, Chinook – also known as King Salmon -- are the ultimate catch for fishing enthusiasts around the world. They're a challenging species to land due to their formidable size and strength, as the hard-fighting fish can weigh upwards of 50 pounds. But if you plan your salmon fishing trip with us, our highly skilled guides will help you hook a lunker.

Sockeye Salmon

Among the five species of salmon found in Alaska, Sockeye or Red salmon are by far the most abundant. Millions swarm the waterways of the Inside Passage, but while they're easy to spot, the 4- to 15-pound fish put up a fight when hooked. And, Sockeyes aren't just an exciting target – according to many people, they're the best-tasting species of wild-caught salmon.

Chum Salmon

Chums are among the larger species of salmon that swim the cold waters off Alaska, averaging between 10 and 15 pounds and sometimes growing to three times that size. Chum salmon fishing vacations are becoming quite popular, as anglers appreciate the difficulty of reeling in the strong, aggressive fish – once hooked, chums battle hard and struggle relentlessly to stay in the water.

Pink Salmon

Compared to the other Pacific species, Pink salmon are the smallest, with an average weight of about 5 pounds. But their size doesn't stop anglers on Alaska salmon fishing trips from targeting pinks, as the fish not only fight when hooked – they can also be caught in large numbers. However, because of their unique life cycle, Pink salmon are easier to land in even-numbered years.

Coho Salmon

Fishing enthusiasts consider Coho salmon to be the spunkiest of the Pacific species, as their speed, aerial acrobatics and fighting spirit make them hard to hook – and fun to catch. Also called Silver salmon, these fish typically only weigh in at around 8 to 12 pounds when fully grown, but Coho have been known to take even experienced anglers on a wild ride.
