WALLS THROUGH

Canon Revisited

Peter Wright

First published in Walls Through Windows: Studies in Writing and Authority in Three Romantic Novels, 2019

Roger's work presented its first unrelenting and oppressing methods that have been traditionally used in the study of the canon. Roger's methods, which he called "the methodological canon" could be described as the means by the author of the canon to the means of the church's acceptance and acceptance of specific texts. Roger's methods were based on the assumption that the canon's acceptance of specific texts in particular books is determined by their faithfulness to the apostolic tradition. He held, unlike, other contemporary scholars, that the canon's acceptance of specific texts in particular books was the result of contemporary Christianity's practices. Roger argued that "the [Christian] body" could "take a text" and "make it canonical" by its practices, such as its liturgical practices, its preaching, its catechetical practices, the self-attesting attributes of the Scriptures themselves, and the testimony of the Holy Spirit.

Unlike any other new models, the "self-authenticating" model shows the unique advantage of using both internal and external evidence in determining which books belong within the canon and the canon's ultimate judgment on book inclusion. Roger rightly argues:

> When it matters, that is, it concerns people who have not grasped the New Testament plot or are unwilling to submit to its authority, the church cannot ultimately ground the canon in the church's authority. After all, if the canon bears the very authority of God, to what other standard could it appeal to ensure itself? And