Fer López

Age	Foot	Nationality	Club	Height	Position
22	Left	Spain	Wolves	188cm	AM

Player Overview

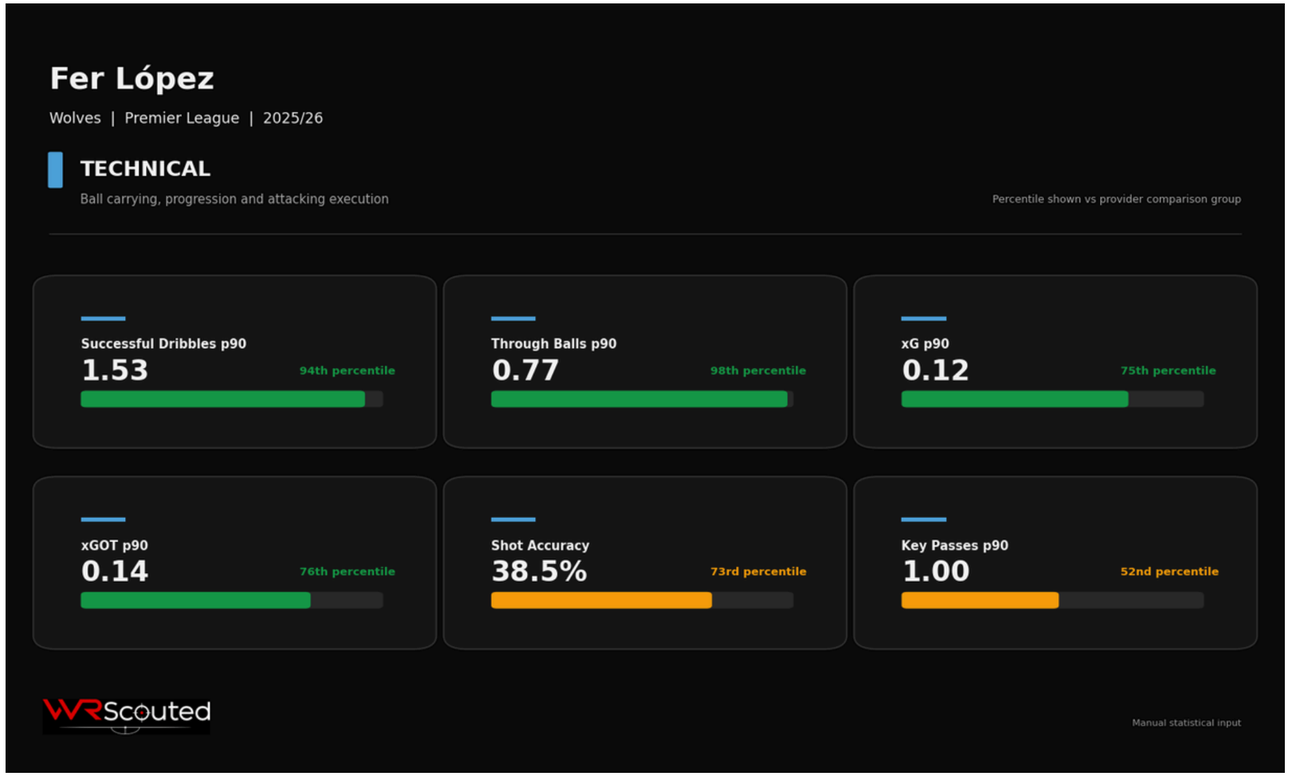

Fer López is a tall, left-footed, goal-scoring attacking midfielder. He can also play from the right side or as a second striker. His biggest value comes from how naturally he finds shooting positions and turns attacking phases into end product. He has good ball-striking and the confidence to take shots early when defenders give him space. He can slide passes into teammates, but he is more dangerous when arriving around the box, receiving on the half-turn, attacking loose balls, or shifting the ball onto his left foot to shoot. At around 1.88m, he also has a bigger frame than a lot of attacking midfielders, although he is still very technical and smooth. The main development points are his defensive intensity and proving he can handle contact when opponents get tight to him. Overall, Fer López profiles as a high-upside goal-scoring attacking midfielder with enough technical quality and end product to outgrow the Championship level.

Fer López

Technical

Technically, López's standout quality is his left-footed ball-striking. He is dangerous when he can receive around the edge of the box, set the ball out of his feet and shoot through traffic. He has a smooth first touch and enough close control to operate between the lines, but he is not really a high-volume playmaker who needs to touch the ball constantly to control a game. His passing is good enough to combine in tight areas, bounce passes around the box and find runners when the option is clear, but his game is more about decisive attacking actions instead of frequent chance creation. He can look very sharp when playing one and two-touch combinations, especially when moving toward goal. The main technical issue is that he can still force moments, either by shooting from difficult positions or holding onto the ball when the simpler action is available.

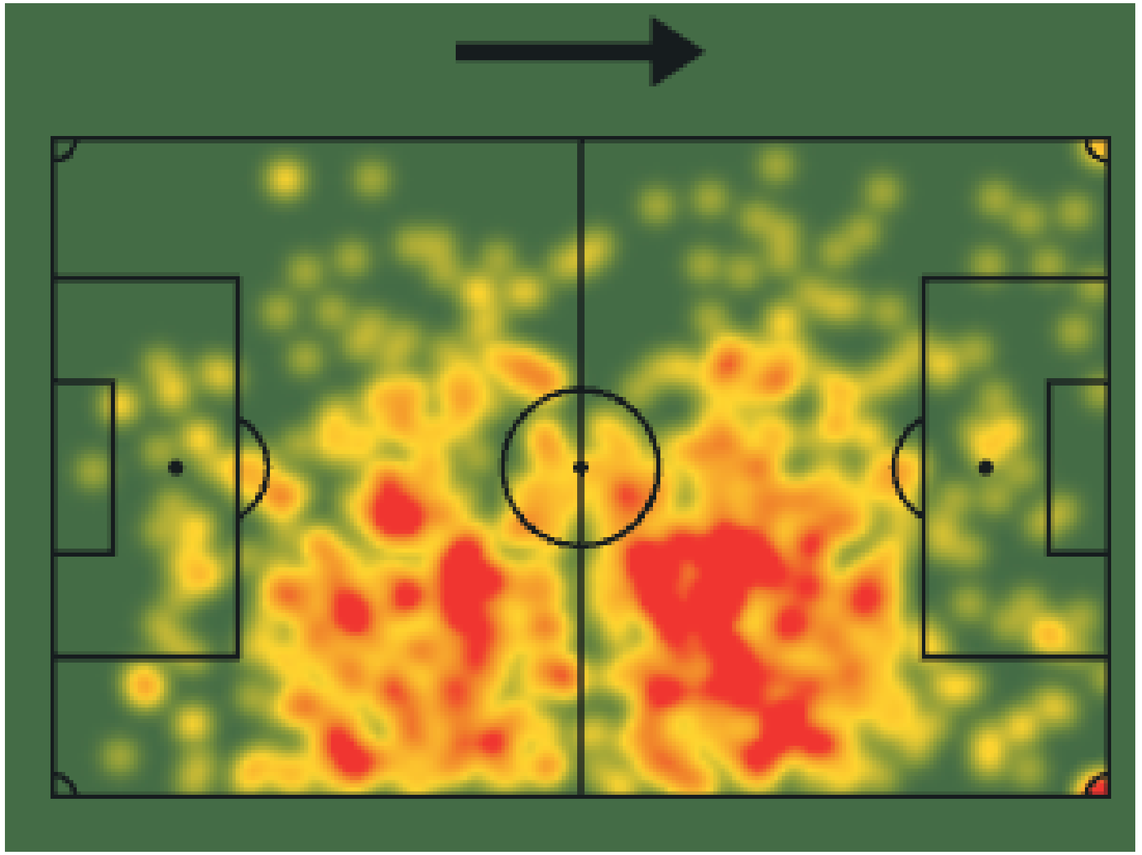

Fer López

Tactical

Tactically, López is most effective when he is given freedom to drift into central attacking pockets instead of being locked to one area of the pitch. He can start from the right and come inside onto his left foot, play as a 10 behind the striker, or operate almost as a second forward in possession. His movement around the box is one of the more interesting parts of his game; he consistently looks to arrive in areas where he can finish attacks. That makes him difficult for midfielders to track, especially when he times his runs late. He is less useful if asked to stay wide and create like a traditional winger, because his best work comes closer to goal. Out of possession, he can still improve his defensive consistency and intensity, especially if he is playing in midfield rather than as part of the front line.

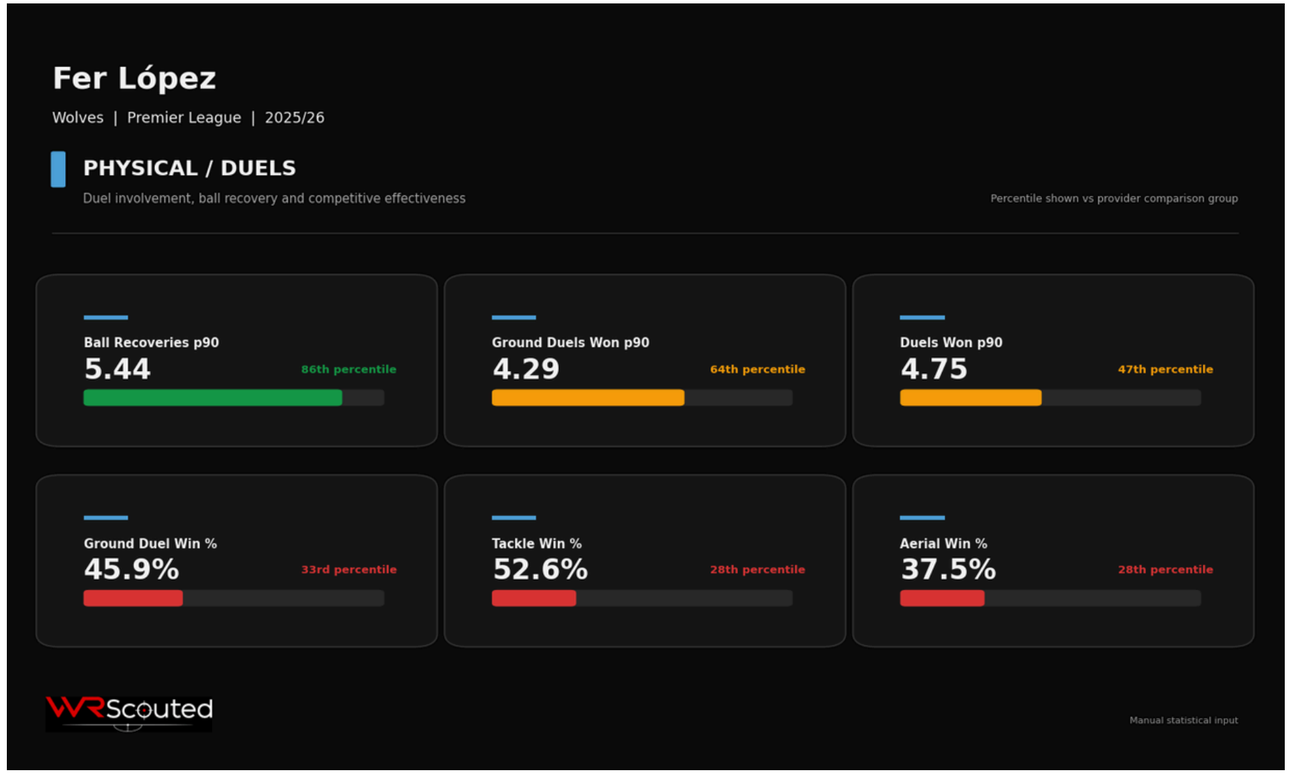

25/26 La Liga Heatmap

Fer López

Physical

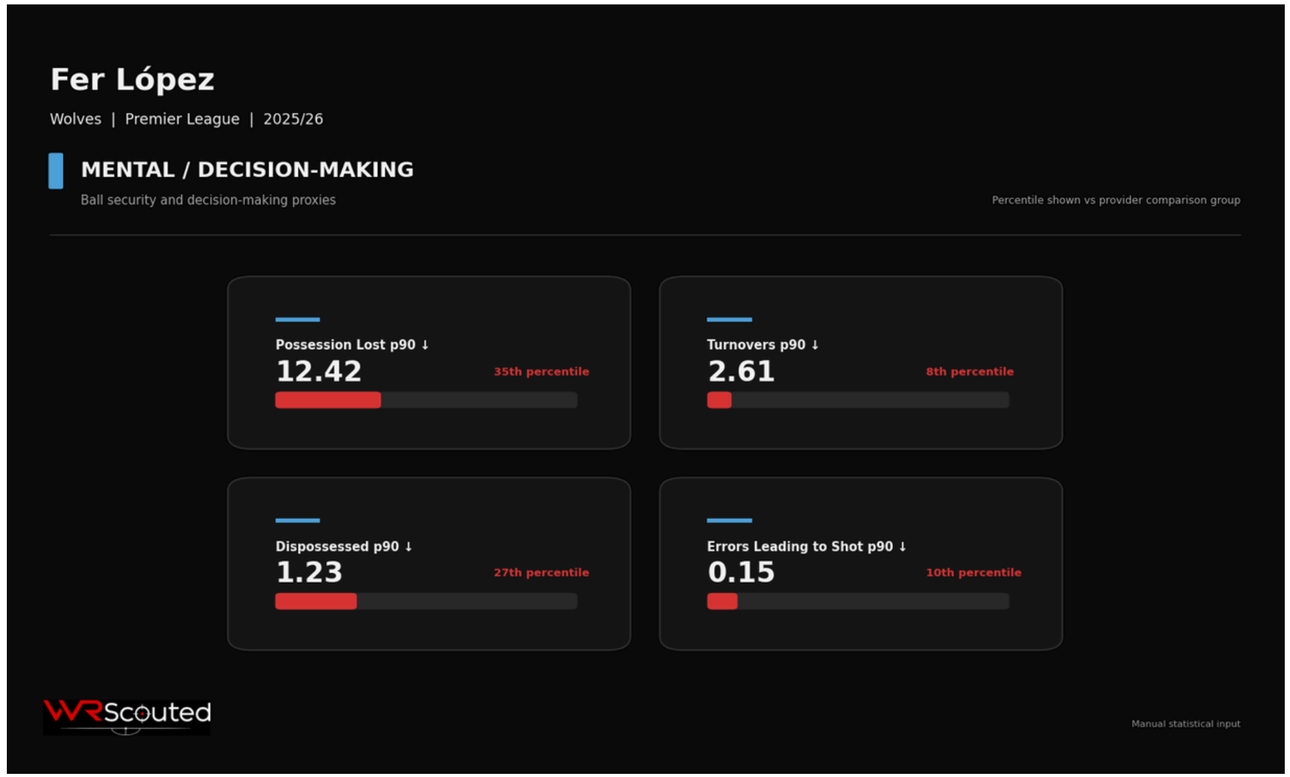

Physically, López has a good frame for an attacking midfielder, with height and reach that give him more presence than most players in his position. He is not explosive in the way a winger is, and he is not especially powerful in duels yet, but he moves well for his size and has enough balance to receive under pressure. His athletic profile is more about his coordination, timing and arriving into space than raw speed. He can carry the ball over short distances and shift away from pressure, but he is not someone who will consistently beat defenders with his acceleration. The next step is adding more strength and contact resistance, because stronger midfielders and centre-backs can try to disrupt him before he gets set to shoot or combine. If that physical side to his game improves, his technical qualities should translate much better at a higher level.

Fer López

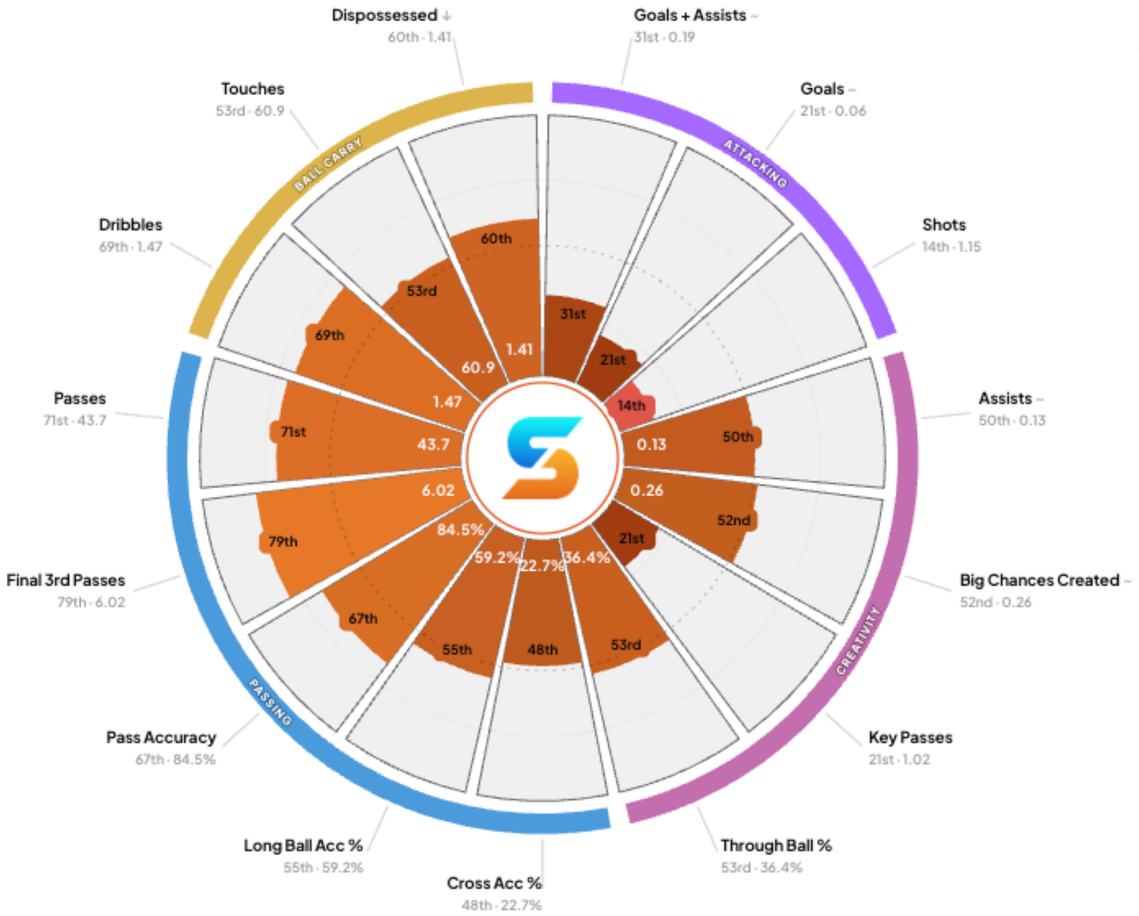

Mental

Mentally, López plays with the confidence of someone who believes he can decide games. He is willing to take responsibility in the final third, take shots, attack dangerous areas and look for the action that can change a match. He does show a good instinct for where the ball might drop around the box, and he has the personality to keep trying things even if earlier actions do not come off. The balance he needs to find is between confidence and patience. At times it looks like he can chase the big moment too quickly, but that same directness is also what makes him dangerous. With more maturity, he can become more selective with his shots without losing the attacking edge that makes him stand out.

Fer López

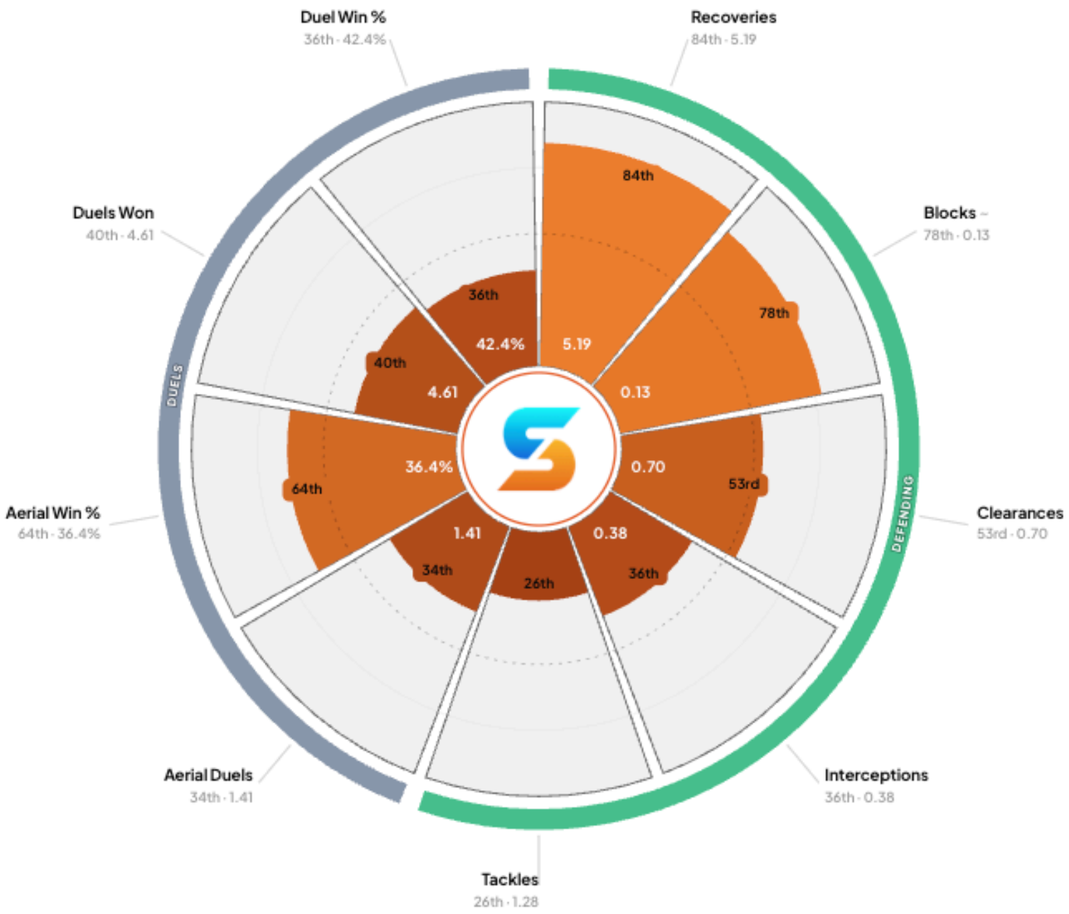

Pizza Chart (Attacking Metrics)

Compared to all U23 Attacking Midfielders from the Top 5 Leagues (2025/2026)

Fer López

Pizza Chart (Defensive Metrics)

Compared to all U23 Attacking Midfielders from the Top 5 Leagues (2025/2026)

Fer López

Conclusion

López profiles as a goal-scoring attacking midfielder with strong left-footed ball-striking, clever box movement and the confidence to take responsibility in the final third. He is not a pure creator or a traditional winger, and his value should be judged more through shots, goals, arrivals and decisive attacking moments than through constant playmaking. He still has areas to improve, such as his defensive involvement/consistency, physical robustness and decision-making when he is crowded out, but his upside is clear. With his size, technical quality and natural goal threat, he has the profile of a player who can outgrow the Championship and become a useful squad player for a Premier League-level side.

Current Level

Starter

Potential Level

Squad Player