PROCESS & DESIGN

AMONGST THE FLORA AND FAUNA, THE MOST IMPRESSIVE ARE THE TREES.

While in their natural habitat, they not only provide an ecosystem for birds and other animals, but filter the air we breathe, absorbing carbon dioxide while releasing oxygen, reducing the “greenhouse effect” as well as storm water run off and temperature control in our environment. In the beautification process of live edge craftsmanship, we have a glimpse into the remarkable survival and journey of each individual trees’ lifespan, through the grain of their wood. The myriad of markings and coloration that make the live edge slabs so impressive to the eye, are all telling signs of the trees’ health, diseases, age, environment, including wood-boring insects and wildlife habitat. These imperfections create an interwoven, one-of-a kind, timeless masterpiece.

D. C. Aquilante’s designs not only originate from fallen timber but unveil the most captivating sub surface structure of the tree, a majestic stump and root system implemented in many of the conceptual framework prior to meticulous fabrication of each original piece. The process is quite extraordinary as it requires extensive preliminary preparation before the wood is selected. After each log is milled into slabs, it will then begin an extensive period of air drying before it is transferred into a kiln, where it will be dried in a temperature controlled environment to ensure moisture has been removed. After the kiln drying process the wood will then be re-acclimated to the climate in the shop before the actual fabrication can commence.

"It's an exciting time to watch what was a small boutique sideline, making furniture for friends and family, evolve into a business crafted by my own custom designs, where no two pieces are the same. What's even more exciting is the expansion into distribution of wood slabs, not only locally salvaged wood but also imported hardwoods that give so many of my designs their own individual character." says Dan Aquilante. "It truly is an honor seeing the satisfaction and appreciation my clients have for the tedious work that goes into each design, all by hand."
