How I Use My Voice in Writing

What type of voice do I use in my writing? Well, it depends on the situation sometimes it can be to prove a point of view, argument, setting of a story, or even making a story and throughout my writing my voice will change on but on a deeper level when I use it , It's always to prove my point or statement .

When I read about "The Rhetorical Situation by Lloyd F. Bitzer" I learned that the Rhetorical situation is something that either solves or responds to the exigence like the problem. How I apply that is when I use my voice in writing to address a problem, and how it can shift the way I communicate. We have an audience that brings an opinion to the problem or the way we think about something on our own, so when I use my voice in my writing it can change.

Whenever I write an essay I have to ask myself what I'm going to addressed for example if I was to write why you should buy a pair of Nike shoes instead of a pair of Vans I have to prove to the reader ("audience") why it's a good choice to pick Nike shoes so my voice will change because I'm arguing why a pair of Nike shoes is better than a pair of vans so I have to prove my point and then ask myself how does these main idea shape in my writing and consider every detail I use to make my voice heard and clear and shift to one element to another to prove my statement and that's how Rhetorical situation can be used by and more .
