Reflecting On My Literacy Narrative

Writing my literacy narrative felt a little bit challenging. When I was planning on how I was going to draft my story, I wanted to focus on three things that shaped my literacy. One I wanted to put my experience in three different paragraphs so that the reader could understand my point of view in each one, I wanted them to understand why I chose those three experiences that were how it was to be a naive speaker, A book I felt connected to , and the struggle I faced in writing and reading out loud in front of classmates and these were the strategies I used to compose my literacy and narrow each of those topic to make my reader understand . I felt like I was connected to my story from the very beginning. I made it clear how my journey began and the challenges I had to face and through my literacy I went more in depth, which each of my different topics as you go on in reading my story.

What came the easiest when it came to writing my literacy was writing my first paragraph because it was where I explained how my literacy started since; I went to school and the challenges I faced in the very beginning. Some of the challenges I faced in writing my literacy were brainstorming back to the past and remembering what happened and picking something that was an extraordinarily strong challenge I faced when it came to reading, writing, and speaking. Also, I had to balance each paragraph so that it would make sense when the reader was going to read it. How I wanted my audience to feel when they were reading my literature, I wanted them to understand a perspective of how it was like to be a native speaker since that is question, I get asked the most and show them the challenge I faced. Not everyone as a native speaker faces what I did, but they could have an idea of how it was to grow up being a different person than everyone else.

What specific changes did I make between my draft is switching up my paragraphs since I did three different topics, I wanted each transition to make sense and smooth so my audience would understand what was going on in my literacy. How did the peer review and other things helped is that we were able to discuss each point and reflect on it and what were some changes we could do to make it more narrow to understand and read and we also got to learn about their challenges and what is something they connected to . What is one thing I am most proud of my narrative is checking my grammar, revising, and looking back to see everything is correct and sharing my story with others and I was able to engage a lot with my literacy and challenge myself in sharing something new to my audience.

What did this assignment teach me about writing skills is that transitioning is very important because you want the reader to understand what is going on while there reading it you want them to engage with your writing instead of making them feel bored and grammar is was in an important skill I learned making sure my punction and words were spelled correctly. How I would approach my major essay differently is that I want to grab my audience more and give a lot of key points and useful information to inform. What strategies from this process will I continue to use in the future are checking over grammar, rereading each of my paragraphs, and making sure each transition is smooth.
