What makes a good arborist? There are a few key things homeowners can look for.

What Yard Services Will You Need?

Before collecting quotes, it's best to understand the scope of an arborist's duties and assess what services you might need. You'll need to provide a clear description of the issue to the professional service. It's best practice to get multiple quotes for your situation and compare the level of service each business provides.

Contractors may also offer better prices in their areas of expertise. However, just because it's cheaper doesn't mean it's better. Be suspicious of very low quotes if you can't vet the company's qualifications.

Are They Qualified?

One of the most important things to verify with a potential arborist is their certification. The International Society of Arboriculture (ISA) is the primary organization to look to. A qualified servicer will typically hold one or more of these three certificates: ISA Certified Arborist, ISA Certified Tree Worker, and ISA Board Certified Master Arborist.

The highest level of recognition is the master certificate. Those who receive it have vast experience in the field. Membership in other tree care organizations or local sustainability boards is also a good sign.

Do They Have a Lot of Experience?

It's also helpful to determine how much experience an arborist has. This can include years of service and years spent specializing in specific species or issues.

This is a good way to filter through their local reputation and reviews. Homeowners should also look for references from past clients with similar needs.

Ask About Safety Standards

Pruning and removal can be dangerous, so look into professionals' safety procedures. All arborists should carry robust liability insurance. They should also be willing to share how they meet industry safety standards.

This is also a good time to check the team's equipment. Modern, carefully maintained machines keep the job safe and efficient for you and them. Don't be afraid to ask questions about their technique, as improper pruning can harm the tree's health and pose safety risks.
