

Entertainment Prop Bets

Now comes the exciting part! When it comes to entertainment wagers, things are already a little crazy, but once you get into the realm of prop wagers, things become much more so.

Example bets that you could come across in an entertainment betting prop bet area include deathmatches, various award show occurrences, and which stars will play unclaimed parts in future movies, to name a few.

If you like pulling for the death of someone you dislike, deathmatches may be the greatest bet type for you. However, death matchups may be a little dismal and gruesome at first glance.

These death bets are often placed on fictitious characters from television programs.

Occasionally, a death matchup will ask you whether one person or group of people will die before another person or a specific group of people.

Other times, a death matchup will ask you whether someone will die within a specific timeframe.

People who like watching the Academy Honors or Razzie Awards on their own and want to add a little bit of additional excitement that has nothing to do with who is really receiving the awards can consider placing a bet on a miscellaneous award show incident.

One example of the aforementioned bet that is presently being offered is whether or not the Best Female Singer winner will drop the Grammy while on stage; if you properly predict "Yes," you will gain nine times your initial investment in profit owing to the +900 odds on offer.

As a result, it looks like the chances are not in your favor, as picking "No" is associated with -5000 odds, which indicates that you must risk $5000 only to get a $100 profit.

Prop bets for reality TV shows are also extremely popular. The process of elimination or awarding immunity is a common focus for prop bets, especially in shows like Survivor, where betting markets often center on who will win immunity challenges or be eliminated next. American Idol is another example, with betting markets including who will be eliminated and the gender of the winner. In general, common betting markets for reality shows include elimination of contestants and who might win challenges. Betting on reality shows allows viewers to engage more deeply with the content they enjoy, making the entertainment odds even more exciting.

Finally, unclaimed actor parts in upcoming blockbuster films are particularly entertaining to wager on since you can really hedge your emotions while betting on them. For example, the ongoing search for the next Bond Girl for the 2026 film is already a prop bet market, allowing fans to speculate and wager on who will be chosen.

It is possible to wager on whether an actor you dislike will receive a future part over an actor you like, creating a win-win scenario in which you either get the actor of your choice to perform the role or gain some money on your investment.

For example, you can already place bets on which actor will play the next Superman even before the film's release date has been revealed, with Michael B. Jordan presently the favorite at +110 odds to be the next Superman.

For those who aren't fond of this, you might instead place a wager on the second and third favorite actors to portray Superman, who is Armie Hammer (+400 odds) and Oscar Isaac (+700 odds), respectively.

Consider the following scenario: you like Michael B. Jordan as an actor and want him to become the first black Superman ever.

In order to protect your feelings, you might place a wager on Hammer and Isaac and consider yourself a winner regardless of what happens in the movie.