

A bumblebee collects pollen from a thistle in Ozark. Although they significantly contribute to the fertilization of plant and crop life, in recent years, their numbers have decreased. Climate change, habitat loss, and competition from other species have greatly affected the population, cutting their numbers down by 90%.