

Should language learning be objective?

The Forgotten Ingredient to Language Learning.

I'll ask you a very important question. Are you ready?

Should language learning be funless?

Many people forget the most important step to take when starting to learn a new language. That step is to MAKE IT FUN. Please, allow me to explain what I mean.

Learning a foreign language can could be a valuable component of a balanced education. Although the world has progressed tremendously with the help of technology and AI, mastering a new language, like learning anything in life, remains a matter of dedicated effort and time.

Even though technology and AI have come a long way, picking up a new language still takes serious time and effort.

Nowadays it's just so easy to open Google Translate or DeepL, type down what you want to translate, and that's it. Or go open to a language exchange apps which have has a translator included and communicate with people from overseas.

Easy.

On the other hand, there are many apps like Rosetta Stone, Duolingo, or Elsa that have proved fruitful are great in making language learning with users increasingly engaging.

Thus Therefore, the only some of the problems learners have is are the plethora of choices out there, ranging from teachers to applications apps, and websites, and also their trying to maintain consistency.

How does one sustain their consistency of effort to achieve mastery in a new language?

How can you stay consistent and keep working towards mastering a new language?

Commented [VD1]: AU: This headline is very broad and doesn't explicitly tell the reader what they're about to read. Since the article is about emotional attachment and how important this is, what do you think about this heading? It includes the theme of the post.

Commented [DV2]: I've removed the original introduction because it contains unnecessary introductory material that delays the main point. The revised opening gets straight to the topic, making the article more direct.

Commented [DV3]: There's a variation between formal and informal language. Since your voice is more informal, I will keep it that way.
