

Al Gore in this award-winning book, An Inconvenient Truth, called Sankalp Sharma India's youngest Climate Reality Leader.

17-year-old Sankalp Sharma has been invited to represent India at the UN Youth Assembly Conference in New York. This conference will explore sustainable ways to manage climate change and the water crisis the world is facing.

Sankalp is raising funds through Fueladream.com to make the trip to the UN Youth Assembly. At his young age, he has already addressed thousands of people to raise awareness about the conservation of water. He has given presentations on the Climate Crisis in schools, colleges, corporate organisations and the Indian Army. He has met with influencers who can make a change and spread the word of the climate crisis to a larger number of people. He has organised events like the Grand Water Conservation Walk in Bangalore with over 1500 participants.

Over 1.2 Billion people don't have access to clean drinking water in the world. The United Nations General Assembly has recognised that clean drinking water is a human right. The Supreme Court of India has established time and again that clean drinking water is a fundamental right. Despite all of this, clean drinking water is a resource that billions of people have no access to. The lack of water and sanitation could be the underlying reason for the next world war, that is the seriousness of this problem.

The world needs young leaders like Sankalp now more than ever. He needs your help to make it to New York to be part of the solution to a problem that threatens to change the face of our planet and our lives.

Helping Sankalp Sharma raise 2 Lakhs will impact millions of people across the world as he works towards a sustainable, long-term plan for water conservation.
