

What is Love? And how does it find its way home?

Love is the most significant emotions we encounter as people. It's greater than us, which means, however, we can welcome it into our lives, we don't have the authority over the how, when and where love begins to express itself. Some of the time, love really strikes like an electrical jolt to the chest, and you aren't prepared for it.

In spite of the fact that there is a wide range of sorts of love experience, the sentimental and affectionate expression of love is the thing that, in some way or another, we're all seeking.

The reason being that the majority of us find fulfillment through the comfort of a deeply committed and romantic relationship, so it's easy to acknowledge that the idea of love plays a big role in all of our lives.

But, because love takes on different forms, we can each experience love in our own way, which is why defining the term 'love' is so complicated. Notwithstanding, love is a beautiful and curious thing and most people are looking for it.

When you lose somebody you once loved, you might just come to understand that life without that person simply doesn't work the manner in which it should.

I am an open person and I believe that whatever is meant for me is for me and whatever is meant for you is for you.

A lot of times we think that we're in love and it wasn't what we thought was love. When it comes to love and relationship, we are always trying to make that connection with someone and sometimes we find that that connection is truly not for us.

My grandma said sometimes we have to go through a certain road in life in order to get to where we need to be (this pertains to every area of our lives, whether work, life or relationship). Understand that all love stories are not the same. Never base your relationship with the love story you see on tv.

Regardless of whether the hand of destiny is pushing us toward the direction or whether we are unknowingly moving towards a goal without understanding that we are, such love has a way of finding its way home.

Always trust in the language of the heart and sense your way through life.

Along these lines, when a condition emerges that does not match your mental picture, move into your heart and consider the more prominent lesson contained within the experience.

Life is self-serving since you are the exemplification of life. The universe communicates through you since it can't see the material realm without a user.

You are the experiencer and the user, introducing life through you.

So quit wishing endlessly the present moment, seeking after something better and be present and mindful to your surroundings.

All things considered, what is intended to be will always find a way into your life, regardless of whether you agree to it or not.

Regardless of what you believe or don't believe, whenever it comes to love, you need to always have a bit of faith. With a bit of faith and love in your heart, miracles can happen and your love will find its way back home.

Sometimes when you love someone so deeply that you can't let go, the world has a way of bringing you back together and making love finding its way home. If love exists as a tangible substance, which many seem to believe, then it only seems logical that true love must also prevail.

When I met my present partner, I was not looking for a relationship. I had not given up on the prospect of love, but I was at a point in my life where that was not my main focus.

More often than not, when you are not looking for someone to love, that is when people tend to appear. The simple truth of concentrating on different interests emits a quality of confidence to other people. Concentrating on your life development not only improves you as an individual but also makes you a better potential life partner. That is something that exudes from one's identity and radiates that attractive confidence.

When you are frantically looking for love, you will be bound to date any jerk that comes along.

Patience is the key to finding the right person and letting love find its way home. Rushing into finding somebody opens you up to the vulnerability of falling for the wrong person like somebody who may just be looking for a fling.

In this way, next time you are out with your companions, unwind, take a deep breath, have some good times, and be yourself. Try not to try so hard to make somebody like you. Simply give love a chance to sprout normally. You may wind up in love sooner than you might think.

These are what works for me. It probably won't be the same for everyone. I can't say that I understand exactly how love works, or whether it is only an illusion, but in my experience and in the experience of countless others we often get exactly what is that we need and the love meant for us always finds its way home.

But if love doesn't find its way home, then it's not where it should be in the first place. You don't need to chase love, it will find you if that person is for you.