

Wanderlust

By: Victoria Antoine

Wanderlust seems to be the common theme of this years' Fashion Week, and Tory Burch seemed to deliver just that this year leaving us feeling as we could afford that platinum card to the all exclusive yacht club.

Burch celebrated her parents effortless practical chic-style, this year with a line that made us feel both relaxed and expensive all at once. On a hot friday New York morning, in the garden of the Cooper Hewitt Museum, guest, and models galore were surrounded by, freshly set lemon trees helping everyone easily forget about the fast paced New York streets of Fifth Avenue that blazed below.

Burch's collection which ranged from pillowy cream to, sparks of color that had me pleading for spring to come back made me feel as though I was well traveled woman that was ready for her next destination, rather be that the streets of New York or the cobblestone streets of Italy.
