Subject: (HTML VERSION): Sending Hope From Your Own Home

During this unprecedented crisis, we are not able to celebrate Easter in a church, but as a Catholic community we can still remain connected through our faith and by helping others.

We may not know what tomorrow will bring, but today we can feel better about the future by giving a gift to people who are most vulnerable.

Dear Friend,

Ours is a God of hope. That's what Easter is all about.

Just when things feel hopeless, the stone is rolled away and an angel announces to the mourning women, "He is Risen!"

These three words have the power to change lives.

Helping people in need delivers on that hope, warms our hearts and makes our community stronger. And now, more than ever, we need to feel connected, strong and optimistic.

Every year, I look forward to celebrating Easter Sunday. This year will look very different for many of you. I know it will for my family and for so many of the families you have supported around the world.

But there's something I've learned from people like you—especially over the past couple of weeks. When we give of ourselves—to someone in need—we build connections across distance and space.

Despite the despair you may feel when you hear about our current crisis—especially as it touches your own life—the work you make possible around the world creates a tiny space of hope in this world for ourselves and so many others.

Will you make our Catholic community stronger by helping families and saving lives with an Easter gift today?

This Easter Sunday, feel closer to fellow Christians and to God's heart by helping those most vulnerable. Let's all stay connected through God's love.

Peace and light,
