The spring season can often call to mind images of pastel palettes, floral patterns and light, flouncy fabrics. London Fashion Week however took a new spin on Spring 2019 and brought styles back to intricate and artistic fundamentals. This nostalgic newness has inspired us to participate in a trend a bit more tactile and rustic in nature than the typical “ethereal” spring look.

With the age of D.I.Y upon us, we’ve all learned to love homemade items. Even if that means an item just looks handmade (because we definitely wouldn’t be able to craft these macrame fashions) this trend will give a new dimension to modern fabrics and styles in one’s wardrobe. As we have seen with all trends, what goes around comes around and surely enough those “new” fabrics and styles we have today will happily come back around as a fresh look for another season in the future.

The spring season is a fresh start, but no one ever said it had to be simple. With this macrame trend, the more intricate the better. We don’t necessarily suggest d.i.ying this tricky technique yourself to wear this new trend (unless you have those skills already) but we do suggest purchasing a macrame item and supporting an artisan with magnificent talents. This art form should truly not be lost. We always look for newness in what we wear and how we wear it but sometimes the best things are the things that have been there all along. Something fresh might be right under your nose or in someone’s closet just waiting to be discovered. We like to think of this new spring season as bringing us back to earth — back to our roots, grounding us. This may just be the true “new” you need this coming spring.
