Imagine the entertainment industry with complete gender parity. Professional women in Film & TV no longer hit the glass ceiling because it's gone. They are valued and paid well for the skills and experience they bring to the table, and they bring other women up behind them.

Welcome to the world of Glass Elevator, which is working to make this vision a reality.

Glass Elevator is a networking and skill sharing tool founded by film director, Jen McGowan, and Level Forward, a studio venture that aims to focus on backing projects driven by women and persons of color.

Our free, membership-based international community of nearly 5000 vetted industry women has been designed to strengthen the skills, relationships, and network of all members. Who and what you know is currency in the entertainment business, which is why we're focused on increasing and sharing the wealth, as well as getting women working.

Membership grants you access to job postings, peer-to-peer career advancement classes, social events, and a searchable database of our Member Directory, which currently includes executives, talent, above the line, heads of departments, and crew from script through to criticism. They hail from every union and guild. Some are Emmy and Academy Award winners.

Our members not only drive forward their own careers, but they also advance our vision by creating classes and events for other members, participating in members' offerings, by conducting themselves professionally and ensuring they provided the same opportunities to others that they have been provided.

"Knowing is half the battle." - G.I. Joe. Together, let's go crush that glass ceiling.
