Is plagiarism a matter of ethics or a matter of decisions made while writing? Are these two ideas different or the same? Explain.

Is Plagiarism always intentional?

I used to think so, until I learned more:

- It's possible to plagiarise from yourself.
 - ◆ Repurposing a paper from a previous class or writing one paper for two separate classes (without permission from both instructors) is plagiarism.
- Also plagiarism: The writer mis-attributes a quote or idea to the wrong source.
 - ◆ This is why it's good to learn how to cite sources correctly.
- What other ways might somebody unintentionally plagiarise?
- What are some ways of intentional plagiarism?

In-Text Citations

While working on your Annotated Bibliography, you may need to quote or paraphrase from your source.

- What does it mean to paraphrase?
- What is a good way to paraphrase without using the exact words from the author or source?

Common sense and ethics should determine your need for documenting sources. You do not need to give sources for familiar proverbs, well-known quotations, or common knowledge (For example, it is expected that U.S. citizens know that George Washington was the first President.). Remember that citing sources is a rhetorical task, and, as such, can vary based on your audience. If you're writing for an expert audience of a scholarly journal, for example, you may need to deal with expectations of what constitutes "common knowledge" that differ from common norms.

Short Assignment 5

Works Cited and References Lists

- Using the four or five sources in the research packet for your topic, use MLA style to create a Works Cited list of all sources.
- Then use APA to create a References list of all sources.
- The two lists can be created in a single Word document. Save your file "SA5YourLastName,"
